

In the final days before the world fell apart, four individuals — Alex, Beth, Chris, and Dana — gathered in an old, crumbling studio, seeking refuge from the chaos outside. The disease, Zeta X, had begun its silent march, spreading quickly from city to city, and hope was dwindling fast.

The world around them had descended into silence. Streets that were once filled with life now lay barren, and the air felt heavy with the weight of inevitable collapse. Each of them had their own way of coping with the end. Alex, always the optimist, believed that if they kept creating, perhaps they could leave behind something meaningful. Beth, struggling with the loss of everything, found herself questioning if it was all worth it when so many were dying. Chris, who had always been able to capture moments with a simple click, now felt helpless as the moments grew fewer and fewer. Dana, with her passion for defiance and expression, looked out at the world and saw only decay.

Despite the growing despair, they kept working. Alex filled the room with bold strokes of color, capturing fleeting moments of beauty amidst the chaos. Beth crafted delicate forms from discarded materials, trying to give new life to what was being lost. Chris took pictures of their surroundings, freezing the world that was slipping away, and Dana turned every surface she could find into a vibrant expression of the world's final struggle.

But as Zeta X continued to ravage the city, their bodies began to weaken. Alex's breath became labored, his once-quick movements slowed. Beth's hands began to tremble uncontrollably, and her once-fine work fell apart. Chris could no longer lift his camera, and Dana struggled to hold her paintbrush steady.

In their final hours, they worked in silence, pushing themselves until the very end. They were too weak to speak, but each of them poured what little remained of their strength into their work. The world outside was slipping into darkness, and they knew they wouldn't survive to see another day.

Alex collapsed first, unable to continue. Beth's trembling hands could no longer create. Chris, struggling to see through his blurred vision, dropped his camera to the floor. Dana, her body spent, finished one final mural before she too gave in.

The disease claimed them all, just as it had claimed the world. The studio was silent, but their work — unfinished, raw, and untamed — remained behind, a silent tribute to the world they knew and the beauty they had tried to hold onto. In the end, the four of them did not survive, but their last act of creation, though unseen by others, was their final defiance against the end.
